EXPLANATION:

Gifford Pinchot (1865-1946), generally acknowledged as the first forester in the United States, was the first chief of the United States Forest Service and President of the National Conservation Association. He was a committed Christian who as an adult worshipped in the Episcopal Church. He embraced the idea of Stewardship, advocating the conservation of the nation's forest resources by planned use and renewal, coining the term "conservation ethic" as a way for humans to use and celebrate God's Creation. Long before Earth Day became part of our cultural consciousness, Pinchot encouraged Americans to have a deepened awareness and care for the environment.
